Agate has a long history. About 100 million years ago underground magma was spewed out by changes in the Earth's crust. As the lava cooled, steam and other gases formed bubbles. The bubbles are sealed up when the rock freezes and form many holes. After a long time, the holes are immersed in a solution containing silicon dioxide, which condenses into silica gel. The fusible content of the iron-bearing rock enters the silica gel, and eventually the silicon dioxide crystallizes into agate.
